The once-young Lower East Side gallery district is quickly maturing: neighborhood galleries are beginning to welcome artists back for sophomore efforts. The latest to win a second show in the neighborhood is the Brooklyn-based Caccamise, whose paper constructions of phrases first appeared at Eleven Rivington in early 2008. Definite crowd pleasers (nothing wrong with that), the works range from twists on familiar sayings, "I only have eye for you," one reads, to more deadpan irony-laced expressions: "Communication Breakdown," for instance.
